Abstract. This communication suggests that one of the motives for the theoretical confusion found in the research on affect is the researchers’ lack of explicitness regarding some fundamental choices, both specific and epistemological: these choices are linked to the researcher’s values and beliefs. The case of research on attitude is presented as an example.